Act I

The Animal Tamer invites the audience to visit his menagerie—featuring “the serpent Lulu.”

Act I

Lulu is sitting for her portrait, observed by Dr. Schön, a wealthy newspaper publisher and her long-time lover. Alone with Lulu, the Painter tries to seduce her. Just then her husband, the Physician, forces his way into the room and collapses in shock from a heart attack. Lulu, seemingly unmoved, realizes she is a rich widow, while the Painter wonders what will happen to her.

Lulu and the Painter have married. She is surprised to learn that Schön—who years earlier had found her on the streets, given her an education, and then made her his mistress—has become engaged. Schigolch, an old man and friend of Lulu's who may be her father or a former lover, pays her a visit and she gives him money. Schön now wants Lulu out of his life so that he can marry. He reveals the story of her past to the Painter, who is so horrified by it that he cuts his throat. Schön is shocked by Lulu's cold reaction but she, dismissing his protestations, replies that he will eventually marry her anyway.

Weeks later, Lulu is appearing in a ballet composed by Schön's son, Alwa. In her dressing room, she tells Alwa of her latest admirer, the Prince. After she has gone on stage, the Prince talks to Alwa of his love for Lulu. Suddenly she storms back in: she has seen Schön in the audience with his fiancée and refuses to dance for her. Schön soon follows and demands to be left alone with Lulu. He asks her not to stop his marriage, but when she mentions her plans to marry the Prince, he realizes that he is incapable of letting her go. At Lulu's dictation, he writes a letter to his fiancée to break off the engagement.

Act II

Schön and Lulu, now married, live in a luxurious home, but she continues to attract admirers, among them the lesbian Countess Geschwitz. Schön is distraught that such people are now part of his life. The Countess, Schigolch, an Acrobat, and a Schoolboy gather at the Schön house and all three men declare their love to Lulu. Alwa appears and, thinking himself alone with Lulu, also declares his love. Schön, who has observed the scene, drives his son away, then hands Lulu a revolver, demanding that she shoot herself to protect his reputation. Lulu justifies herself by saying that she has never pretended to be anything but what she is. Schön forces her to her knees but is distracted by the Schoolboy's cries for help. Lulu fires five shots into her husband's back and begs the returning Alwa not to turn her over to the police.

An orchestral interlude depicts Lulu's arrest, murder trial, imprisonment, illness with cholera, commitment to the hospital, and the plans for her escape: the Countess, who has allowed herself to be infected with the same disease, is to take Lulu's place in the hospital.

Alwa, together with the Countess and the Acrobat, awaits Lulu's return in Schön's former apartment. When she arrives on Schigolch's arm, the Acrobat is appalled by her wasted appearance and leaves, threatening to betray her to the police. Alone with Lulu, Alwa again proclaims his love and agrees to go to Paris with her.

Act III

A crowd has assembled in Alwa's Paris mansion in honor of Lulu's birthday. A number of the company have invested in a new cable railway and question the Banker about their prospects. The Marquis, threatening to reveal Lulu to the police as Schön's murderer, tries to blackmail her into working in a brothel, but she defies him. The Acrobat also tries to blackmail Lulu, then Schigolch appears, asking her for money. Lulu breaks into tears. Together with Schigolch, she plots to dispose of the Acrobat by having him killed. There is uproar as the news spreads that the railway shares have collapsed—everyone is ruined. In the confusion Lulu escapes, just as the Marquis arrives with the police.

In a shabby garret in London, Alwa, now syphilitic and a derelict, and Schigolch await Lulu's return from her first night as a prostitute. She arrives with a client, the Professor, who remains silent throughout the proceedings. As he leaves the now destitute Countess appears, bringing with her Lulu's portrait. Lulu and her three admirers contemplate its beauty and how their fate has been bound up with it. Lulu goes into the street again, followed by the Countess, while Alwa reflects on the mess he has made of his life. Lulu returns with another client, an African Prince. In a clumsy attempt to protect her, Alwa attacks him and is killed by him. In despair, Lulu rushes out into the street again. Schigolch drags Alwa's body away and disappears. The Countess returns. Gazing at the portrait, she considers suicide when Lulu arrives with yet another customer, Jack the Ripper. They argue about money, then go into her room. Suddenly Lulu is heard screaming—Jack has killed her. The Countess tries to help but Jack stabs her as well. He leaves as the dying Countess cries out for Lulu.

Alban Berg

Lulu

*Premiere: Opera House, Zurich, 1937;
Théâtre National de l'Opéra, Paris, 1979 (three-act version)*

One of the most important—not to mention notorious—stage works of the 20th century, Lulu is the drama of a young woman who sexually and emotionally dominates a wide range of willing victims, both male and female. Herself a victim of society, she seems to embody all the frightening aspects of the human condition before and after civilization, a combination of primal instinct and distinctly modern amorality. Alban Berg was a leading light of the Second Viennese School of composers who sought to free art from the conventions (and thereby the vices and hypocrisies) of contemporary society. With Lulu he created a unique musical language to depict this new type of heroine. The score uses the twelve-tone technique pioneered by Berg's teacher Arnold Schoenberg but in a keenly dramatic way that makes it accessible to all kinds of audiences. Bringing Lulu to the stage was a difficult process. Berg died before completing Act III of the score, and the opera was first performed as a fragment. Efforts to finish the score based on Berg's notes were hindered by his widow and only realized, after her death, by the composer Friedrich Cerha, in 1977. Ever since, Lulu has commonly been performed in the completed edition.

The Creators

Alban Berg (1885–1935) came of age amid an explosion of artistic and intellectual creativity in Vienna. Among the most visionary and influential composers of his (or any) time, his vocal and instrumental writing infuses the compositional techniques of Schoenberg with the grandeur of such late Romantic composers as Gustav Mahler. Berg's first atonal opera, Wozzeck, caused a sensation at its Berlin premiere in 1925. Friedrich Cerha (b. 1926) is an Austrian composer and conductor who has championed the works of various and diverse artists. Frank Wedekind (1864–1918) was a German playwright whose works are searing and often scandalous critiques of bourgeois society and especially its sexual hypocrisy. Among his most famous works is the 1891 drama Frühlings Erwachen (Spring Awakening). The Lulu plays, Erdgeist (Earth Spirit, 1895) and Die Büchse der Pandora (Pandora's Box, 1904), were banned from public performance throughout Wedekind's lifetime.

The Setting

The drama unfolds in Vienna, Paris, and London. No time is specified in the libretto, but references to current events (revolution in Paris) and characters (Jack the Ripper) suggest a late-19th-century setting. The Met's new production takes its visual inspiration from the period of the opera's composition.

The Music

The score of Lulu is built on an elaborate technique based on so-called "rows" of twelve notes to encapsulate ideas and feelings. This compositional system, devised by Schoenberg, replaces the traditional theory of harmony of the Classical and Romantic era with a new structure in which all twelve notes within an octave are treated equally. But there are also several self-contained units that recall earlier forms, with such titles as "Chorale" (late in Act I) and "Canon" (early in Act II). Lulu has a song with a clear beginning and end ("Canzonetta," Act I, Scene 1, accompanied by saxophone), and again in Act II, Scene 1, when she declares that she has never pretended to be anything but what she is. There are even love duets (Act I, Scene 1, and Act II, Scene 2). Besides the saxophone, the vibraphone provides an unusual and evocative sound throughout the score, seeming to "purr" in the first love duet and signifying a suspenseful moment when heard after the interlude between the two scenes of Act II. And while there may be no real melody, there are recognizable themes: one, heard at three fateful encounters between Lulu and Dr. Schön, reminds many commentators of the central theme in Wagner's Tristan und Isolde, with its suggestion of the fatal nexus of love and death. Themes representing the men in Lulu's life return at the end, implying that her tragic fate is a form of vengeance from her previous victims. Effects like this allow audiences to appreciate this extraordinary score, whether they're familiar with twelve-tone style or not.

Met History

The Met first performed the incomplete Lulu in 1977, with James Levine conducting a cast headed by Carole Farley in the title role alongside Donald Gramm, Tatiana Troyanos, and William Lewis. John Dexter's production was designed to be adapted to Cerha's three-act edition once it became available. The complete Lulu premiered in December of 1980, with Levine conducting Teresa Stratas in the title role, Franz Mazura in his Met debut as Dr. Schön/Jack the Ripper, and Kenneth Riegel as Alwa. Julia Migenes, Catherine Malfitano, Christine Schäfer, and Marlis Petersen have been among the memorable interpreters of the title role in subsequent years; with James Courtney and James Morris as Dr. Schön; Evelyn Lear, Hanna Schwarz, and Anne Sofie von Otter as Countess Geschwitz; and Ronald Hamilton, David Kuebler, and Gary Lehman as Alwa. William Kentridge's new production opened November 5, 2015, with Petersen in the title role, Johan Reuter as Dr. Schön, Susan Graham as Countess Geschwitz, Daniel Brenna in his Met debut as Alwa, and Lothar Koenigs conducting.

Program Note

On May 6, 1934, a year and a half before his death, Alban Berg wrote to his close friend and fellow composer Anton Webern that he had completed the composition of Lulu but would still need “two or three weeks” to “overhaul” the work and to fill in a few gaps before starting on the orchestration. Of the time that remained to him, he spent about three months writing the Violin Concerto. The rest he devoted to scoring the opera, beginning with excerpts for a concert suite that includes the Intermezzo from Act III and extensive sections of the finale. He then scored the remainder of the work consecutively from the beginning, but died before completing the full score of the last act.

In an article on Lulu in the October 1936 issue of Musical Quarterly, the composer's biographer, Willi Reich, wrote: “Berg left a complete and very carefully worked out preliminary score of Lulu. Only the instrumentation of a few places in the middle of the last act was not finished and this could easily be carried out from the given material by some friend familiar with Berg's work.” Erwin Stein's vocal score of Acts I and II was published in the same year with a prefatory note by the publisher, Universal Edition, stating that the vocal score of Act III would be published “at a later time.” Stein's reduction of the final act was, in fact, completed, but the publication was interrupted after 70 pages had already been engraved. The Nazi takeover of Austria was imminent and there was no longer a German or Austrian opera house where Lulu could be staged. On June 2, 1937, the opera was performed for the first time, in Zurich. Of the music for Act III, only those portions that Berg had incorporated in the Lulu Suite were presented, as “background” music to an adaptation of the final episode of the drama: the murder and death of Lulu and the Countess Geschwitz.

The completion of the scoring by another hand could have but one purpose—the preparation of the opera for performance. But in the following years of political reaction and war this can hardly have seemed a matter of urgency. Under Hitler and Stalin, “atonal” music was banned as an expression of “Jewish Bolshevism” on the one hand and “bourgeois decadence” on the other. Even where there was no political repression, “neo-classicism” had come more and more to dominate the world of contemporary music from the late 1920s to the end of the war. The first revival of the opera at the Venice Biennale in 1949 does not seem to have aroused much attention. In 1952 a concert version recorded in Vienna was released by Columbia Records, and in the following year there was a second staged revival, the German premiere of the opera in Essen. The preparation of a performable third act was again becoming a matter of practical interest. In the meantime, Stein's vocal score of Act III remained unpublished. The musicologist Hans Redlich had been allowed to examine it in connection with his study of the composer's life and work published by Universal Edition in 1957. He argued in the strongest terms for a completion of the score. At the insistence of the composer's widow, however, he was required to insert a statement that badly undercut his own position. It was to the effect that Schoenberg, Webern, and Zemlinsky—three of the finest musicians of the age, and among Berg's closest friends and colleagues—had each been shown the material of Act III and had declined to complete the orchestration because they found the material inadequate to this purpose. All three were dead by this time, and Helene Berg's supposed recollections were the sole source of their reported opinion.

The question of scoring and the question of performing the third act are interdependent, and if Mrs. Berg's refusal to allow either was to be respected, then one could infer the elimination of the possibility or necessity of the other. But the implications of her position were interpreted to mean much more than this. Not only was the vocal score of Acts I and II reissued with the original prefatory reference to a forthcoming publication of Act III deleted, but Stein's partially engraved reduction and all other unpublished materials of Act III were suppressed, in that all access to them was refused. Through the good offices of one of the directors of Universal Edition, the late Dr. Alfred A. Kalmus, this ban was temporarily lifted in the 1960s, and subsequent investigation confirmed Redlich's conclusions (and the original representations of the publisher) that Berg had indeed completed the opera and that completion of the full score of Act III by another hand was entirely feasible.

As Redlich had pointed out, this task is greatly facilitated by the formal design of the final scene, which is based on large-scale recapitulations of earlier episodes that were fully scored by the composer. But beyond this, Berg's overall dramatic conception is a radical departure from Wedekind's, in all-important respects that had not been previously noted. The substitution of a fragment of the play accompanied by "background" music taken from the Lulu Suite not only misrepresents Berg's own version of Act III, but retrospectively misrepresents both the music and the drama of Acts I and II as well. And the published edition of Acts I and II, in deriving its list of dramatis personae from Wedekind's drama instead of the music and libretto of the complete opera, was in itself a misrepresentation of the composer's intentions. Berg emphasizes the relative anonymity of the subordinate roles by depriving them of the names assigned to them by Wedekind, identifying them instead only by their titles or professions. Only the five principal roles—Lulu, Schigolch, Dr. Schön, Alwa, and Countess Geschwitz—are designated in the opera by their proper names. Thus the distinction that Wedekind himself had made between the identity of Lulu, each of whose three husbands has his own name for her, and that of the other characters is sharpened in Berg's libretto. Each of Lulu's three victims in the first half of the opera—the Physician, the Painter, Dr. Schön—is respectively paired with one of the three clients whom she brings in from the street in the final scene—the Professor, the African Prince, and Jack the Ripper. They function as symbolic avengers of those who have lost their lives because of their love for Lulu. It is these doublings, in fact, that explain the musical recapitulations noted by Redlich.

These multiple roles are essential to the dramatic structure of the opera. But others that are merely a matter of convenience and economy are also highlighted by musical means—leitmotifs, serial connections, vocal range and style, musical quotations. Practical performance problems that are presumably the province of the director rather than the composer are thus mapped into the work itself. This is consistent with the change that Berg made in Alwa's profession. In the play Alwa is a writer who does a bit of composing on the side, as Wedekind himself did (the "Procurer's Song" of Act III is one of Wedekind's own cabaret tunes), and he is explicitly identified as the author of Earth Spirit. In the opera Alwa is by profession a composer, and allusions to two of Berg's own compositions, Wozzeck and the Lyric Suite, identify him as the composer of the very work we are witnessing.

In these revisions of Wedekind's Lulu plays, Berg was influenced by the revolutionary developments in the German theater that followed Wedekind's death in 1918. A technical innovation of the period was represented in the composer's introduction of a film sequence in his original libretto. This served as a bridge between Part I of the opera (Act I – Act II, Scene 1), based on Earth Spirit, and Part II (Act II, Scene 2 – Act III), based on its sequel, Pandora's Box. Part I shows Lulu in her ascendant phase, culminating in her marriage to Dr. Schön, the newspaper publisher and powerful man of affairs whose mistress she has been for many years. It concludes with the murder of Dr. Schön. This he brings upon himself when he discovers Lulu with his son, Alwa. In a state of final desperation—as a mad climax to his earlier attempts to marry her off, so that some external power would enforce the break with her that he is too weak to effect—he hands her his revolver and demands that she shoot herself.

An orchestral interlude between the two halves of the opera represents the action implied between the conclusion of the first play and the beginning of the second: Lulu's arrest, trial, imprisonment, removal from prison because of illness, commitment to the hospital, and escape. Part II shows Lulu in her descendant phase: after her escape from prison, she returns to the murdered man's apartment to meet Alwa, who has helped to plot her escape. They find refuge in a gambling salon in Paris, from where they are forced to run away a second time when the Marquis threatens to turn Lulu in to the police if she persists in her refusal to be sold into slavery. The opera ends with Lulu's first and last evening as a common streetwalker in London, where she dies at the hands of Jack the Ripper.

Shortly after Helene Berg's death on August 30, 1976, it was revealed that Viennese composer Friedrich Cerha had fulfilled the publisher's secret commission to complete the score while she was still alive, and that the premiere performance had already been promised to the Paris Opera. It is in the nature of things that one cannot anticipate the insights, judgments, and second thoughts of genius, so we can never know to what extent and in what respects Berg's own orchestration might have differed from Cerha's. But nowhere does one have the impression that a hand other than the composer's has had to take over the instrumental realization of the unscored portions of the third act. In spite of Helene Berg's attempt to perpetuate her ban beyond her own lifetime through the stipulations of her will, the materials for an authentic performance of this masterpiece of the lyric theater were at last available.
