Act I
The noblemen de Brétigny and Guillot de Morfontaine are having dinner with three young women—Poussette, Javotte, and Rosette—at an inn in Amiens. People gather for the arrival of the coach to Paris, among them Lescaut. He is waiting for his young cousin Manon, who is on her way to enter a convent. The coach arrives and Manon expresses her exuberant joy about her first journey away from home. Enchanted by her, Guillot offers to take Manon to Paris, but she and his companions laugh at him. Lescaut reproaches Manon for her behavior, which could shame their family. Manon gazes with envy at the elegant clothes of the other girls. The young Chevalier des Grieux arrives too late to catch the coach, which has already left for Paris. He falls in love with Manon at first sight, and when she tells him that it is her fondness for pleasure that has led her family to send her to a convent, he is determined to rescue her from such a fate. They escape together in Guillot’s coach. The returning Lescaut furiously accuses Guillot of having kidnapped his cousin, but then learns from the innkeeper that Manon went off with a young man. Guillot, mocked by everyone, swears revenge on the eloping couple.

Act II
In their apartment in Paris, des Grieux writes to his father for permission to marry Manon. The maid announces visitors: Lescaut and another man, who, she warns

Act V
The road to the port of Le Havre
Manon, is de Brétigny in disguise. Lescaut, using the argument of family honor offended, berates des Grieux for having abducted Manon. In fact he is trying to profit by setting her up with de Brétigny. Des Grieux, to prove his honorable intentions, produces his letter. Meanwhile, de Brétigny tells Manon that des Grieux's father is planning to kidnap his own son that evening; if she does nothing to prevent it and instead comes to live with de Brétigny, she can have wealth and luxury. After Lescaut and de Brétigny have left, des Grieux goes out to post his letter. Manon realizes she is unable to resist de Brétigny's offer and bids farewell to her life with des Grieux. Des Grieux returns to find her weeping, but she will not tell him why. He talks of his dream of an idyllic future together in the country. When there's a knock on the door Manon begs him not to answer it, but he goes. Looking out the window, she sees him being abducted.

Act III
On a public holiday, a crowd has gathered at the Cours-la-Reine. Manon, now living with de Brétigny and the toast of Paris, praises the pleasures of her luxurious existence. Overhearing a conversation between de Brétigny and the Count des Grieux, she learns that the count's son, following an unhappy love affair, is about to become a priest and will preach later that day at the seminary of St. Sulpice. Manon doesn't believe that des Grieux could have forgotten her and leaves the festivities to find him.

At St. Sulpice, des Grieux has attracted much admiration for his sermon. The count tries to dissuade his son from entering the priesthood in favor of marriage. Des Grieux is adamant but realizes that he can't forget Manon. When she appears he angrily confronts her. She admits her guilt but begs him to forgive her and to remember their past love. Des Grieux yields to his feelings and renounces his vows.

Act IV
Gamblers are gathered at the Hôtel de Transylvanie, among them Guillot and Lescaut. Manon and des Grieux arrive, and she reminds him that his fortune has nearly run out. He accepts Guillot's challenge to play. Manon, Poussette, Javotte, and Rosette consider what money might bring them. Des Grieux wins heavily and Guillot accuses him of cheating, threatening to inform the count. The police arrive and des Grieux is arrested. The count assures his son that he will be released soon. Manon, as his accomplice, is taken away to prison.

Act V
Des Grieux and Lescaut have come up with a plan to rescue Manon, who has been sentenced to deportation to America, but their paid accomplices have deserted them. Lescaut manages to bribe the guards and leaves Manon and des Grieux alone together. Ill and exhausted, she begs des Grieux to forgive her for the shame she has brought him. While she recalls their past, he only thinks of their future together. But the rescue has come too late. As des Grieux assures her of his forgiveness and love, Manon dies in his arms.
Premiere: Paris, Opéra Comique, 1884
A take on the quintessentially French tale of the beautiful young woman who is incapable of forsaking both love and luxury, Massenet’s Manon features one of the truly unforgettable, irresistible, and archetypal female characters in opera. While the story is firmly set in class and gender issues of the past, the character of Manon herself is timeless, convincing, and familiar. The lover she can neither forget nor completely commit to is a young chevalier, des Grieux, who is caught in his own struggle between his desires and the expectations of society. The opera triumphs in its portrayal of love within an oppressive (if outwardly gorgeous) society: his father, her cousin, and various men interested in her for their own reasons are always hovering near the lovers. Manon has been a success ever since its premiere, championed by a diverse roster of singers who have cherished its dramatic opportunities, exalted style (maintained even when painting a searing portrait of the basest human traits), and ravishing music.

The Creators
Jules Massenet (1842–1912), a French composer wildly popular in his day, was noted for his operas, songs, and oratorios. His somewhat sentimental style lost popularity in the early 20th century, with only Manon maintaining a steady place in the repertory. Several of his other operas, especially Werther (1892) and Thaïs (1894), have been performed more frequently in the last few decades. His librettists for Manon were Henri Meilhac (1831–1897) and Philippe Gille (1831–1901). Meilhac also collaborated on the libretto of Bizet’s Carmen, several of Offenbach’s most popular operettas, and a farce that became the basis for Strauss’s operetta Die Fledermaus. Gille was a dramatist who also worked with Offenbach and co-wrote the libretto to Delibes’s Lakmé. The text of Manon is based on the hugely influential novel L’Histoire du Chevalier des Grieux et de Manon Lescaut by the colorful Abbé Prévost (1697–1763), which would also be used as an operatic source by Giacomo Puccini in 1893.

The Setting
The opera is set in and around Paris, with familiar landmarks such as the church of St. Sulpice forming important reference points in the story. The first act takes place in the smaller city of Amiens, and the final act on the road to the seaside port of Le Havre. The opera was originally set, as in Prévost’s novel, in the early 18th century, a time known as the Regency that would become notable for a high level of governmental corruption. The Met’s new production places the drama in the late 19th century, the so-called “Belle Époque” and the time when the opera was written.

The Music
Massenet’s score captures the drama of his most memorable heroine with deft craftsmanship, expressive vocal and orchestral writing, and an almost unparalleled level of sensuality. A solo violin accompanies the first meeting of the lovers—this melody will become their main love theme. There is no shortage of passion, perhaps most notably in des Grieux’s Act III aria “Ah! fuyez, douce image,” in which he struggles with his longing for Manon. But much of the music’s sensuality is different from what one would expect in an Italian opera, or even a more earthy French work such as Carmen. Some of the most dramatically (and erotically) charged passages rely on the simplest effects; the quivering of the violins, for example, when the lovers finally touch in the St. Sulpice scene is a brief musical detail, but it is as voluptuous as anything in opera. Likewise, many of the solos rely on subtlety and delicate colors for their effect; the refinement of both Manon’s “Adieu, notre petite table” and des Grieux’s “En fermant les yeux” (known as “Le rêve,” or “The Dream”) in Act II create a sense of breathless wonder and suspended time. Massenet also achieved a convincing mood of nostalgia with faux-Baroque touches, particularly in Manon’s famous Gavotte in the first scene of Act III, “Obéissons quand leur voix appelle,” a paean to the joys of youth whose reflection of the past functions on both personal and historical levels.

Manon at the Met
Manon premiered at the Met in 1895 with Sybil Sanderson in the title role. The California-born diva was a favorite of Paris audiences and of Massenet himself, who had written the title role of Thaïs for her the year before. Polish tenor Jean de Reszke sang des Grieux and French bass Pol Plançon was the Count. Geraldine Farrar and Enrico Caruso led the cast of a new production in 1909. Twenty years later, the legendary Joseph Urban designed another new staging that featured Lucrezia Bori and Beniamino Gigli. The Brazilian soprano Bidú Sayão was a favorite Manon in 22 performances from 1937 through 1952. Licia Albanese (11 performances) and Victoria de los Angeles (15 performances) were the most popular interpreters of the title role through the 1950s, with Giuseppe Di Stefano and Nicolai Gedda among the great tenors singing des Grieux during this period. New productions by Günther Rennert (with Gedda, Anna Moffo, and Giorgio Tozzi) and Jean-Pierre Ponnelle (featuring Catherine Malfitano, Dénes Gulyás, and Ferruccio Furlanetto) followed in 1963 and 1987, respectively. Julius Rudel conducted Renée Fleming and Marcello Giordani in eight performances of the Ponnelle production in 1997, and Jesús López-Cobos led Fleming and Marcelo Álvarez in 2005. Laurent Pelly’s new production, conducted by Fabio Luisi and starring Anna Netrebko and Piotr Beczala, opens March 26, 2012.

Set in Paris during spirited but turbulent times, Massenet’s Manon explores the constant discrepancy between wealth and poverty, duty and desire. The idealistic des Grieux and his beloved Manon are caught between these poles and are powerless to survive. Des Grieux’s fevered dreams of a simple life fade before his eyes as Manon is arrested for prostitution. But rather than turning to po-faced morality, Massenet preserves the lovers’ touching idealism right through to the opera’s final bars. Composed for Paris’s popular Opéra Comique, Massenet wanted to make this hand-me-down tale more accessible, more tangible for his 1880s audience. So instead of patronizingly portraying the lovers as a foolish couple, the composer’s rich melodies and harmonic eloquence make us realize why they dared to dream.

Born in St. Étienne in southeastern France, Massenet moved to Paris with his family when he was just a child. The establishment of the Second Empire in 1852 and the great urban transformation heralded by Baron Haussmann created a heady artistic and social city. Thrown into a world where grand opéra turned to opéra comique, when Wagnerism was at its height, and when Baudelaire and absinthe mixed together in an intoxicating cultural cocktail, Massenet was gifted an extraordinary apprenticeship. Although initially reluctant to try his hand at composition, he won first prize in the esteemed Prix de Rome in 1863. When he returned from further studies in Italy, Paris welcomed him back with open arms.

While Massenet would trump operatic peers such as Saint-Saëns, Bizet, Delibes, Lalo, Fauré, and Duparc, he was a slow starter. The eventual success of Le Roi de Lahore (premiered at the Opéra National’s extravagant new Palais Garnier in 1877) brought Massenet to wider attention. Offers came in from various collaborators and theaters, including the increasingly chic Opéra Comique. Based at the Salle Favart, just off one of Haussmann’s new boulevards, this rival for the Opéra National’s claims on the city’s operatic legacy prided itself on more realistic work. Bizet’s Carmen had set the trend in 1875, with many wishing to follow in its stamping footsteps. Formally less strict than the Opéra National, the Opéra Comique employed dialogue, dancing, and well-known tales. It fostered a new brand of theatrical realism that paved the way for verismo and Puccini at the turn of the century.

Massenet was an opportunistic composer and the suggestion from one of the Opéra Comique’s directors to write an opera based on Abbé Prévost’s famous novel Manon Lescaut suited him down to the ground. There was not a person alive in France who didn’t know the story. The book had already been adapted as an opera by Daniel Auber and as a popular sung drama in the early 1850s. But what had been a previously moderate success became Massenet’s calling card. It was a bold choice. Being the people’s opera house, the Opéra Comique also guarded common morality, and Manon Lescaut was a distinctly salacious tale. So, rather than emphasizing the sexual aspects, Massenet and his team created a delicate story of lost innocence. Manon was to be tender and domesticated.

Unlike Auber’s opera or Puccini’s passionate Manon Lescaut (first heard in 1893), Massenet’s Manon is about a world at odds joined by young love. A chance meeting on the road to Paris sets in train a whole series of romantic and ultimately tragic episodes. Des Grieux comes from a strict, moralistic background, while Manon’s family, represented by her cousin Lescaut, introduces her to a world of gambling, sex, and alcohol. The magnetism of that carefree life is immediately apparent in Massenet’s score, the trish-trashy jangle of the tambourine and the endless stream of baroque-inspired dances characterizing glorious vanity. Bright major keys and chirruping sweethearts—Pousette, Javotte, and Rosette, all with interchangeable names and identical dotted music—stand out against des Grieux’s ardent melodies.

That disparity is immediately apparent in the overture. A fizzy prelude gives way to an amorous middle section representing the young lovers. Des Grieux’s first entrance in Act I similarly shifts us from those lurid tones to a balmy string-led accompaniment featuring the young man’s cello theme. It is a style that returns at the beginning of the second act and later in his passionate Act III aria “Ah! fuyez, douce image.” But however insistent he is, des Grieux is unable to keep Manon, his “sphinx étonnant”—mysterious, astonishing sphinx—to himself. A last desperate plea—“En fermant les yeux” in Act II—mimics the brighter keys of her world but is futile. Des Grieux’s commitment and Manon’s flightiness finally clash in the third act. The first scene is a riot of color and celebration. Manon is in her element, greeted by fame and fortune (all provided by the unctuous Monsieur de Brétigny). Massenet cruelly highlights the artificiality of her success with a deliberately formulaic opening scene. Manon shows off with florid bel canto excess in “Je marche sur tous les chemins” and her pert gavotte “Obéissons quand leur voix appelle.” The ensuing ballet apes the old world of grand opéra. Reality finally comes home to roost in the next scene.

The soberness of St. Sulpice—an austere basilica on the other side of the River Seine—is a great shock after the festive atmosphere of the Cours-la-Reine. Having been rejected by Manon, des Grieux has placed himself as far from her as he can. Throughout the scene, Massenet charts a much more realistic course. As dialogue unfolds between des Grieux and his father, the music slowly moves into recitative and then into the count’s “Épouse quelque brave fille.” Left alone, des Grieux is disconsolate. Although “Ah! fuyez, douce image” sounds like a hymn, it recalls the lovers’ passionate music. Praying to God, des Grieux dutifully follows the tread of a distant organ, but he soon breaks out of those liturgical constraints. When the curtain rises on Act IV, desire has won and we are back in Manon’s world of gambling and drink. Des Grieux is out of his depth, Manon has broken de Brétigny’s rules, and the lovers are destined to ruin. Formerly jolly music mocks their choices, and Act V is a doom-laden recollection of what has gone before.

So who is to blame for this tragedy? Certainly not des Grieux, but neither is Manon. Although Massenet’s morality remains clear throughout the opera, there is a touching note of regret that runs through every word the lovers sing. From Manon’s stumbling first entrance—marked “moitié larmes, moitié sourires” (“half tears, half smiles”) in the score—to the heartbreaking “Adieu, notre petite table,” she is clearly no femme fatale. Manon is merely dazzled by the bright lights and the big city, the kind of girl that Massenet would have seen sitting in the gallery at the Opéra Comique—an aspect that is underlined in director Laurent Pelly’s updating of the tragedy to the time of the opera’s composition. But however affectionate the score, Manon’s journey from innocent girl to destitute courtesan is extreme, with Massenet’s eschewal of high drama emphasizing that tragedy. The original Opéra Comique audience may have professed righteous indignation at the lovers’ lot but, moved by Massenet’s tender melodies, they would also have felt profound sympathy, as we do today. In the heroine’s final words, “Et c’est là l’histoire de Manon Lescaut!”—And that is the story of Manon Lescaut! —Gavin Plumley
