Synopsis

Act I

A luxurious mansion on the Calle de la Providencia, the home of Lucía and Edmundo de Nobile, in the 1960s. Guests are expected for dinner, but strange things are happening. The butler, Julio, fails to stop Lucas, the footman, from running away, and the maids Meni and Camila also attempt to leave. The Nobiles arrive after attending a performance at the opera. When the guests go into the dining room, Meni and Camila finally escape, along with some other servants.

At dinner, Nobile toasts Leticia. As Lucía announces the first course, the waiter spills it spectacularly on the floor, but not everyone is amused. Lucía decides to postpone her other “entertainments,” and a performing bear and a number of lambs are removed to the garden. The rest of the servants flee the house despite Lucía’s protestations. Only Julio remains behind.

In the drawing room, Blanca performs at the piano. The engaged couple Eduardo and Beatriz dance, and Leonora flirts with Doctor Conde. When he declines to dance, she kisses him instead. The Doctor confides in Raúl Yebenes that Leonora is gravely ill and does not have long to live. Blanca’s performance ends to general acclaim. The guests encourage Leticia to sing, but Señor Roc protests that she has performed enough for the evening.

A number of guests prepare to depart, while Roc falls asleep. In the closet, Lucía gives her secret lover, Colonel Álvaro Gómez, a fleeting kiss. The guests become lethargic and distracted—although it is now very late, none of them attempt to leave. Though confused, Nobile graciously offers beds to anyone who wishes to stay. Señor Russell and the Colonel are horrified as some guests remove their tailcoats, but eventually they too lie down to sleep in the drawing room. Eduardo and Beatriz retreat to a private corner to spend their first night together.

Act II

The guests wake the following morning. Silvia announces that she slept very badly. The Doctor examines Russell: The old man is dying. Julio is supposed to prepare breakfast but reports that no supplies have arrived at the house. When Lucía tries to take some of the ladies to her bedroom to freshen up, they do not make it past the threshold of the dining room. Blanca is worried about her children, but even she and her husband are unable to leave. Silvia finds the unusual situation humorous, particularly as she knows her son is in good hands with his private tutor, Padre Sansón. A further attempt by the guests to leave fails when Julio approaches with coffee and the leftovers from the previous evening’s dinner. Leticia entreats the butler not to enter the drawing room, but her warnings are in vain. Blanca is desperate, while Raúl sees no reason to get overly excited. Francisco complains that he cannot possibly stir his coffee with a teaspoon. When sent to procure coffee spoons, Julio also seems to have become a prisoner in the drawing room.

Evening approaches. Russell's condition has worsened: He has fallen into a coma and needs urgent medical attention. When they have nothing left to drink, the guests begin to panic. The Doctor pleads for calm, although even he seems to be losing his composure. Raúl becomes aggressive and holds Nobile responsible for the situation. Francisco is frantic and resists all attempts at pacification. Russell suddenly and unexpectedly regains consciousness, expressing his relief that he will not live to experience the "extermination." Beatriz is troubled by the thought of dying amidst all these people, rather than alone with Eduardo.

During the night, Russell dies. The Doctor and the Colonel haul his corpse into the closet, while Eduardo and Beatriz watch in secret.

Intermission (AT APPROXIMATELY 2:20 PM)

Act III

Police guarding the mansion drive back a crowd of people gathered outside. Although some people break through the police ranks, nobody is able to enter the house.

In the drawing room, Julio and Raúl burst a water pipe, and the guests rush desperately to quench their thirst. Tormented with hunger, everyone's behavior becomes increasingly irrational. Blanca combs only one side of her hair, driving Francisco to hysterical desperation. When he is unable to find the pills for his stomach ulcer, Francisco immediately presumes that someone has hidden them. Raúl goads Francisco about his relationship with his sister and triggers a volley of insults between the two men. Nobile tries to keep the peace, but this merely earns him recriminations. Leonora, who is in great pain, expresses her longing for the assistance of the Doctor and the Virgin Mary. Francisco is nauseated by Blanca's smell and once again loses his nerves.

In her delirium, Leonora sees a disembodied hand wandering around the drawing room. Trying to stop it, she stabs Blanca's hand with a dagger. In the closet, Eduardo and Beatriz decide to take their own lives. Señor Roc appears to molest Leticia, but Raúl accuses the Colonel instead. Nobile is injured during the ensuing scuffle. The lambs from the garden wander into the drawing room.

Outside, the army has quarantined the mansion. Padre Sansón appears with Silvia's son, Yoli, and the people demand that the boy be sent inside. Despite encouragement from the crowd, Yoli is unable to get into the house.

The guests have slaughtered the lambs and cook them on a makeshift fire. Leonora recalls a premonition she had on the evening of the opera performance and attempts a magic ritual with Blanca and Leticia. It fails, and she declares that innocent blood is needed. Francisco discovers Eduardo and Beatriz's bodies in the closet. During the course of yet another quarrel, Raúl hurls Francisco's box of pills out of the drawing room. Silvia no longer takes any interest; cradling the corpse of one of the lambs in her arms, she thinks she is rocking Yoli to sleep.

The bear appears across the threshold. Gradually the idea takes hold among the guests that a sacrifice is needed to secure their liberation: Nobile must be killed. The Doctor and the Colonel try to make the others reconsider but to no avail. Nobile declares that he will sacrifice himself, but Leticia interrupts him. She realizes that, at this moment, each of them is in exactly the same place as when their strange captivity began. With her encouragement, the others hesitantly repeat their actions from that first night. Together they approach the threshold and are finally able to cross it. The guests and the crowd outside the mansion encounter one another. Their freedom will not last long.

The Exterminating Angel

Premiere: Haus für Mozart, Salzburg Festival, 2016

Luis Buñuel's classic 1962 film El Ángel Exterminador (The Exterminating Angel), which inspired Thomas Adès and librettist Tom Cairns's opera, has an unusual premise: A sophisticated group of people at a dinner party find that, for reasons that are never explained or even deeply questioned, they cannot leave the room they are in. Over an indeterminate period of time, their basest instincts emerge, and even when the survivors manage to escape, they find that they may be trapped again elsewhere. The film defies attempts at systematic analysis and even seems to denounce the need for answers as one of society's many pathologies. The idea of using a film as a source for an opera is not shocking in itself, but adapting one that has baffled and fascinated both audiences and critics is an extraordinary task. Admittedly, there are obvious ways in which El Ángel Exterminador commends itself to the opera house: There are operatic references in the story, and a formal dinner party is itself a form of theater—one in which there is an acknowledged gulf between what people say and what they actually mean. Still, the strange conceit of this particular film presents great challenges—namely, the unanswered question of why this is all happening. In attempting to address this issue, though, Adès joins a long line of operatic composers. The idea of unseen forces, whether internal or external, that cause characters to behave in perplexing ways has long been brilliantly explored in opera, with the comedies of Mozart, the epics of Wagner, and the many operas that feature supernatural or infernal influences all constructed around this same concept.

The Creators

Thomas Adès (b. 1971) is a London-born conductor, pianist, and composer in a wide range of genres, including chamber, choral, and orchestral music. For the operatic stage, he has previously composed the ripped-from-the-tabloids Powder Her Face (1995) and the Shakespeare-inspired The Tempest (2004), which appeared at the Met in 2012. The libretto for The Exterminating Angel was written, in collaboration with the composer, by Tom Cairns (b. 1952), a London-based designer, director, and librettist who has worked internationally in stage, television, and film. The career of filmmaker Luis Buñuel (1900–1983) spanned several decades, from his groundbreaking 1929 surrealist classic Un Chien Andalou to Cet Obscure Objet du Desir in 1977. He worked extensively in his native Spain—in which he was unwelcome during the years of the Franco dictatorship—as well as in France, the United States, and, for many years, Mexico, where he made many of his most notable films, including El Ángel Exterminador.

The Setting

The opera is set in and around a mansion in a large city suggestive of—but not definitively stated to be—Mexico City, during the 1960s.

The Music

Adès's score examines through music the ideas Buñuel explored with dialogue and visuals alone. (In fact, the film itself has almost no musical underscoring). As the story moves from the comfortably elegant to the disturbingly surreal, pleasant party music evolves into a more unusual ambience, but the familiar and the puzzling are always present in various configurations. Despite the ensemble nature of the work—more than a dozen singers appear onstage together throughout most of the evening—a unique musical personality differentiates each character. The layering of individual voices is one of the fascinations of the score, culminating in such ensemble pieces as a chorus that depicts a sudden retreat into group obsessive compulsive disorder. Over the course of the work, the music reflects increasing panic and the dissolution of societal norms. There are, however, clear musical forms that emerge at all points of the score, even in the most surreal moments. Adès and Cairns also added a few static elements—a duet, an aria, and some other set pieces—that had been suggested by the film's visuals. One of the most striking examples is a duet for the suicidal lovers Eduardo and Beatriz—a sort of dual-liebestod, or "love-death." It, like much of the work, manages to boldly exist at the forefront of contemporary composition while also honoring centuries of past operatic tradition.

Met History

On October 26, 2017, Adès himself conducted the work's United States premiere, in a production directed by Cairns.

Program Note

Thomas Adès is unafraid to occupy dangerous ground. Whether peering into the Duchess of Argyll's private quarters in Powder Her Face (1995) or stepping onto Prospero's island in The Tempest (2004), his theatrical work is unapologetically bold. So when it came to announcing his third opera, Adès was unlikely to hide his light. Inspired by Luis Buñuel's surrealist film El Ángel Exterminador, Adès and his librettist Tom Cairns's new opera takes us to the very edge of horror. Sometimes, the threat is conveyed with a blackly comic glint and, at others, with barbaric ferocity. But a fundamental question hovers over the whole, like the wings of its eponymous yet invisible angel. "What can it mean?" Colonel Álvaro Gómez asks at the beginning of Act II. "I don't know," Raúl Yebenes responds. "There is no explanation."

Extracting significance from—or appending meaning to—Buñuel's film has been a vexing business ever since it first appeared on screen in 1962, when Francisco Franco's fascist regime was at its height in Spain. Buñuel, a Spaniard working in exile in Mexico, obfuscated any message couched in the film in a bid to prevent it becoming the unnecessary focus of interpretative rationalization:

If the film which are you are about to see seems to you enigmatic or incongruous, that is how life is also. It is repetitive like life and, like life again, subject to many interpretations. The author declares that it was not his intention to play with symbols, at least not consciously. Perhaps the best explanation for El Ángel Exterminador is that, rationally, there is none.

Even the evocative title was only added at a later date. The film was originally called Los Náufragos de la Calle Providencia (The Shipwrecked of Providence Street), apparently taking its lead from a painting by Théodore Géricault concerning the 1816 shipwreck of the French frigate Méduse, whose survivors engaged in cannibalism. The idea of a group stranded during a disaster—a theme Adès previously explored with The Tempest—certainly provides a potent metaphor for the film's otherwise mundane scenario, revolving around a dinner party. For generations, similarly dysfunctional dinners have provided vehicles for revelation and degradation, though in this case, none of the guests—nor, indeed, the hosts themselves, the glamorous Lucía and Edmundo de Nobile—is aware of what is about to be unleashed. The servants, on the other hand, are better informed.

The idea of adapting Buñuel's film first occurred to Adès before he began work on The Tempest. Unlike Shakespeare's play, the basis for numerous adaptations, El Ángel Exterminador seems a somewhat unyielding choice, notwithstanding the many references to opera throughout the screenplay. But Adès, whose mother is an art historian specializing in surrealism, insists that the story is fundamentally operatic. "Every opera is about getting out of a particular situation," he says, and "every piece of music is looking for an exit. ... The film is very musical in another way, too, because there's an underground river of meaning, which is not exactly what the people are saying.” Eschewing a soundtrack, Buñuel’s original is characterized by “silences between the spoken lines,” which, while powerful, could be expressed even more forcefully through music. “Music supports the private personality behind the façade on the one hand (and lets us feel empathy with the characters),” Adès explains, “but on the other, it also supports the other force that is pulling them into a kind of shared nothingness.”

In constructing their libretto, Adès and Cairns decided to reduce the number of characters, as well as the length of the text itself, given the extra time needed to sing spoken lines. In the end, however, they were surprised how closely their libretto followed the screenplay by Buñuel and Luis Alcoriza. Nevertheless, there are some notable departures from its dramaturgy, not least in the inclusion of various arias and ensembles, like those in Bach’s Passions. They seem to stand apart from the narrative, while commenting upon it, and allow us access to the character’s “private personalities.”

For these static moments, which do not occur in what Adès calls “real time,” he and Cairns turned to Buñuel’s poetry from the 1920s. And like those surreal texts, the arias, “where the action stops and the music comments on the emotional meaning of what is happening,” have a heightened quality. So what can be a rather objective, detached, and even cold drama in the original El Ángel Exterminador becomes a much more heated and unpredictable experience in Adès and Cairns’s The Exterminating Angel.

The arias that punctuate the action take many forms. Lucía de Nobile’s “Ragoût Aria,” heard near the beginning of the drama, suggests, by means of a latter-day waltz—more in the manner of Ravel’s terrifying La Valse than Johann Strauss II’s lilting Blue Danube—the collapse of a social order. That is certainly one of the main lines of interpretation applied to Buñuel’s film, not least in reference to Franco’s Spain. The opera now invites similar comparisons to today’s global socio-political situation.

Musically, however, the score is more timeless, as given to allusion as it is to vehement dissonance. The Baroque flourishes of Blanca Delgado’s piano variations and her vision “over the sea,” sung “as if remembering a tune from childhood,” imply a Proustian search for lost time. More beautiful, and more ageless still, is the lavish language of Beatriz and Eduardo’s love scenes. Idealists, even visionaries—neither of whom is accorded a surname in the film or the opera—they are completely absorbed in their romance, much like Francisco de Ávila’s obsession with his coffee spoons, his medicine, and his sister, or Leonora Palma’s lustful dependency on Doctor Carlos Conde.

These meditative numbers constitute gathering points in a score that is otherwise typified by states of flux. Throughout, melodies threaten to become murmurs, glissandos decay the primacy of individual notes, and, in one alarming moment, just as the guests try to confront the threshold into and out of the room, the ondes Martenot is instructed to play as if it were “swallowing the orchestra.” This fascinating electronic instrument, invented by French cellist and wartime radio telegrapher Maurice Martenot in 1928, was first used by figures such as Edgard Varèse and Olivier Messiaen, both of whom were drawn to apocalyptic subjects. In Adès’s score, the ondes Martenot “becomes a symbol,” the composer says, “the voice of this ‘exterminating angel,’ in the sense that the instrument is heard whenever a figure says something that contributes to the situation of immobility.” In many ways, its role is mirrored by that of the large arch towering over Hildegard Bechtler’s set.

As the guests step over this threshold that will imprison them and greet each other with the word “enchanted”—which gains a double meaning in the process—the ondes Martenot lends an air of surreality in a passage that is quickly followed by a disturbing repeat of the welcoming ritual. Likewise, when Lucia declares that “tonight’s entertainment has begun,” the ondes Martenot returns to provide an ironic halo. At one point, during the cadenza in Blanca’s ethereal aria, Adès marks that the angel’s “voice” is “not controlled by human will,” emitting music without limitation, while constantly underlining the restrictions placed on those in the room.

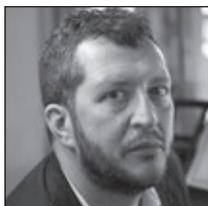

Ultimately, it is the realization, true or false, that these boundaries can be broken that heralds the end of The Exterminating Angel. Like Blanca before her, Leticia sees a vision of home, far away in Jerusalem. Entrenched dissonance falls away, and a new, far-sighted music, marked “transfigured,” appears to have broken the grasp of the invisible angel. The ondes Martenot is mute, the solemn, funereal Wagner tubas and growling trombones fall silent, and Leticia’s voice, like that of a Valkyrie (as her character is nicknamed), takes wing. She sings words from an early-12th-century Zionide by Toledo-born poet Yehuda Halevi, who sadly—and perhaps tellingly—died shortly after arriving in the Promised Land.

As the bells that began the opera return, not ringing in a new dawn but seemingly the advent of martial law—hinted at during the terrifying interlude that follows Act I—we are left uncertain as to the conclusion. Is salvation at hand, implored in the last screaming “Libera me”? Or does the absence of a double bar line at the end of Adès’s score point to a ceaseless cycle? Or perhaps the focus now turns to the audience—the next unwitting throng to be swallowed by that all-devouring angel?
