Synopsis

A pearl-diving village in the Far East

Act I

As the villagers prepare for their dive, they sing of their fear of the sea. Zurga tells them they must choose a leader, and they unanimously swear loyalty to him. Nadir returns to the village after spending a year away. He and Zurga recall that their friendship was almost destroyed when they both fell in love with a Hindu priestess. Nadir swears he has kept the vow they both made to protect their friendship by staying away from her. Nourabad, the High Priest, brings a priestess to the village. She is to sing and pray all night to calm the demons of the deep and to ward off the spirits of the storm. Although she is veiled, Nadir immediately realizes she is Leïla, the priestess he still loves. Zurga, who does not recognize her, imposes an oath of obedience upon her on pain of death. Leïla is to remain veiled and pure. Her reward for keeping the divers safe from harm will be their finest pearl. Nadir, alone, reveals that he and Leïla have met illicitly and that he has followed her to the village. He listens as she begins her incantation and, unable to resist any longer, calls out to her. She breaks off, answering his love.

Intermission (AT APPROXIMATELY 8:20 PM)

Act II

Nourabad tells Leïla that the divers have returned safely and she can now sleep until morning in the temple. He stresses the importance of her vow. As proof of her ability to keep her promise she tells him how, as a little girl, she once protected a fugitive. The man she saved gave her a necklace, which she wears to this day. Alone, Leïla dreams of Nadir, who soon appears by the shrine where she sleeps, and they are reunited. As a storm breaks out, they are discovered and denounced by Nourabad, who blames them for the tempest. Zurga protects his friend from the fury of the villagers, who demand his immediate death. Nourabad tears off Leïla's veil. Zurga finally recognizes Leïla and realizes that Nadir has betrayed their oath. He angrily demands death for the guilty couple.

Act III

The storm has died away but the village has suffered terrible damage from flooding. Zurga's anger has passed and he sadly reflects on Nadir's fate. Leïla intercedes for Nadir and Zurga relents, but his jealousy reawakens when he realizes how much Leïla loves his rival. He allows Nourabad to take her to be sacrificed together with Nadir. Before she leaves, she gives her special necklace to one of the young divers and asks her to give it to her mother. Zurga seizes the necklace with a cry.

Synopsis CONTINUED

The pearl fishers prepare for the ritual deaths of Leïla and Nadir at dawn. Zurga stops them with the news that the village is on fire, and the villagers flee to try and save their children. Zurga releases Nadir and Leïla and explains that he set the village alight in order to rescue them. He reveals that he was the fugitive Leïla saved many years ago. The lovers gratefully make their escape and Zurga is left to face the consequences of his actions.

Georges Bizet

Les Pêcheurs de Perles

Premiere: Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, 1863

Few operas can match the sheer lyric beauty of Bizet's youthful The Pearl Fishers. Critics at the time were not in favor of it—the composer was accused, bafflingly, of imitating both Verdi and Wagner—but the audience was swept up in the ravishing score tinged with the allure of a mythical South Asian setting. The drama itself remains within the conventional standards of the day: in ancient Ceylon, two men have their close friendship tested by their love for the same woman, who re-enters their lives as a priestess sworn to chastity. The desire for physical love eventually overcomes the girl's vows as well as one of the men's oaths of friendship, and the lovers are only saved from the wrath of the community by the other suitor's act of self-sacrifice at the finale. But the somewhat formulaic plot becomes insignificant alongside the accomplishment of the score and the tantalizing musical vision of a distant land that it provides. The Pearl Fishers employs the same blend of exoticism and eroticism that would find such indelible expression in Bizet's subsequent masterpiece, Carmen, but the sensual scope of the music is perhaps even wider in the earlier work with its deliberately vague setting. (An early version of the libretto placed the story in Mexico, but Ceylon was eventually chosen as having even greater "exotic" possibilities.) Though not performed frequently, The Pearl Fishers successfully stands on its own when appreciated for its unique atmosphere, rather than compared to Carmen or held up to modern notions of dramatic plausibility.

The Creators

French composer Georges Bizet (1838–75) was known as a brilliant student and prodigy, but his works only found lasting success after his untimely death. His final opera, Carmen, which premiered to very mixed reactions three months before he died, became a hit shortly afterward and is acknowledged today as one of opera's greatest achievements. Eugène Cormon (1810–1903) was the pen name of Pierre-Étienne Piestre, a French dramatist and prolific librettist. Most of his works are forgotten today, although his play Philippe II, Roi d'Espagne served as one of the sources for Verdi's Don Carlos. His collaborator on Les Pêcheurs de Perles was Michel Carré (1821–72), who also co-created the libretto to Gounod's Faust and Roméo et Juliette and the play that formed the basis for Offenbach's Les Contes d'Hoffmann.

The Setting

The opera is originally set in Ceylon (modern Sri Lanka) in non-historic “ancient times,” signifying an exotic land with a mythical and romantic aura. The Met’s new production places the action in an unspecified locale in the Far East.

The Music

In addition to its striking lyrical expression, the score is filled with surprising and delightful features throughout. The important role of the chorus is evident from the opening number, with its extraordinarily beautiful middle section for men’s voices. The later “welcoming” chorus in Act I and the boisterous Act III number, bordering on a sort of bacchanal, are no less notable. The orchestral writing is equally sophisticated, especially in the subtle touches of instrumentation (which would become so marked a feature of Carmen): flute and harp to denote moments of noble religious sentiment; two piccolos evoking nighttime in the ruins of an ancient temple at the beginning of Act II; a solo oboe suggesting indigenous instruments in the same act. But the highest honors of the score must go to the remarkable solos and duets that have made the opera impossible to forget. Among these are the tenor’s Act I romance, “Je crois entendre encore,” a gorgeous melody that requires both refined delicacy of expression and extraordinary power and discipline; Leïla’s highly ornamented invocation to Siva directly after; her joyful love aria, “Comme autrefois,” in Act II; and Leïla and Nadir’s love duet in the same act, a piece as passionate as anything in Bizet. The most famous moment in the opera comes with the justly celebrated duet between the tenor and baritone, the ravishing “Au fond du temple saint” in Act I. Its abundant melody miraculously encompasses a profusion of diverse sentiment, from religious ecstasy to exalted friendship to sadness and loss.

Met History

Prior to this production, which had its Met premiere on New Year’s Eve 2015, the opera received only four performances by the company. The partial premiere took place in 1896, when the first two acts were presented in a matinee together with Massenet’s one-act La Navarraise, as a star vehicle for soprano Emma Calvé. The first complete staging was seen on opening night of the 1916–17 season, with a cast led by Frieda Hempel, Enrico Caruso, and Giuseppe De Luca. After two more performances, the opera disappeared from the repertoire, although excerpts, most notably the duet “Au fond du temple saint,” have frequently been heard in concert at the Met.

Program Note

“The Orient is...one of [the West’s] deepest and most recurring images of the Other,” wrote the scholar Edward Said in his groundbreaking 1978 book Orientalism. “The Orient has helped to define Europe (or the West) as its contrasting image, idea, personality, experience.”

Georges Bizet’s Les Pêcheurs de Perles springs from a long, prolific vein of European Orientalist music, drama, literature, and visual art. Much like Leïla, the opera’s veiled heroine, the East was portrayed in these works of art as languorous, inscrutable, submissive, primitive, impulsive, tempting, and sometimes even violent—everything that bourgeois, Christian Europe wanted to believe it was not.

Nineteenth-century Orientalism thrived nowhere more than in France. Napoleon’s occupation of Egypt from 1798 to 1801 and Charles X’s expedition against Algiers in 1830 incited a wave of Orientalism manifested over the following decades in such works as Gustave Flaubert’s novel Salammbô; the vivid canvases of Eastern scenes by Jean-Auguste-Dominique Ingres, Eugène Delacroix, and Jean-Léon Gérôme; and Félicien David’s seminal symphonic ode Le Désert, which in turn inspired a raft of Orientalist French operas including Gounod’s La Reine de Saba, Saint-Saëns’s Samson et Dalila, Delibes’s Lakmé, and Massenet’s Thaïs.

The Orientalist flavor of Les Pêcheurs de Perles is palpable in other Bizet operas as well, including La Guzla de l’Émir (1862), La Jolie Fille de Perth (1866), and Djamileh (1871). Even his masterwork Carmen falls under the Orientalist umbrella; “the Orient,” then, could be almost any place deemed exotic. Victor Hugo, in the preface to Les Orientales, defined it as “Hebraic, Turkish, Greek, Persian, Arab, even Spanish, because Spain is still the Orient.”

Bizet (1838–1875) is familiar to all operagoers as the composer of the ever-popular Carmen, the last work he completed before his untimely death at age 36. Les Pêcheurs de Perles dates from 12 years earlier, when he was fresh out of the Paris Conservatory, where he had studied composition with Jacques-Fromental Halévy, the composer of La Juive (whose daughter, Geneviève, he married in 1869). An even stronger musical influence during those years was Charles Gounod, the composer of Faust, a mentor and close friend to Bizet.

By 1863, the year in which The Pearl Fishers was composed, Bizet had already written six stage works, only one of which had been performed. His earliest operas, created during his student days, had been comic and largely Italianate in style, modelled upon the spirited bel canto works of Rossini and Donizetti. After Bizet’s sojourn in Italy from 1858 to 1860 as a winner of the Prix de Rome, his operas turned more serious and more French in style, displaying the influence of Gounod, Meyerbeer, and even the Parisian-flavored late middle period operas of Verdi.

In April 1863, the 25-year-old Bizet was approached by Léon Carvalho, manager of the Théâtre Lyrique, who had been offered an annual grant of 100,000 francs on the condition that he premiere a new work by a recent Prix de Rome winner each year. Carvalho offered Bizet a libretto called Les Pêcheurs de Perles by Eugène Cormon and Michel Carré, an exotic drama set on the island of Ceylon (today's Sri Lanka). One of its chief sources was a recent book, Octave Sachot's L'Île de Ceylan et des Curiosités Naturelles, which included discussions of pearl fishery and the superstitions surrounding it, as well as evocative scenic descriptions. And, though clothed in Orientalist garb, the opera's heroine, Leïla—a virgin priestess who breaks her vows for love—owes much to Julia, the leading lady in Spontini's La Vestale (1807), and perhaps also to Bellini's Norma (1831).

Carvalho's commission to Bizet stipulated a planned opening night in September, obliging him to compose at lightning speed. Luckily, he had a wealth of musical "leftovers" from thwarted earlier works which he could recycle. His unperformed opera Ivan IV yielded music for three numbers in The Pearl Fishers: the orchestral prelude; part of Zurga's Act I aria, "Une fille inconnue;" and the Act III duet "O lumière sainte." The chorus "Brahma, divin Brahma" is drawn from an early, rejected Te Deum, and another chorus, "Ah chante, chante encore," comes from Don Procopio, an early opéra-bouffe unperformed in the composer's lifetime. Bizet completed the score of The Pearl Fishers by early August.

The premiere took place at the Théâtre Lyrique on September 30, 1863. When the first-night audience accorded Bizet a curtain call, the composer, unaccustomed to success, was reported by the writer Louis Gallet as appearing "a little dazed." The opera achieved a respectable run of 18 performances, but the critical establishment did not share the audience's enthusiasm. Benjamin Jouvin of Le Figaro wrote, "There were neither fishermen in the libretto nor pearls in the music." He and other Parisian critics, accustomed to the lighter sounds of Auber and Offenbach, accused Bizet of "Wagnerism," a charge often hurled at his robust orchestrations, which the critics found noisy and overstuffed. One of them called the opera "a fortissimo in three acts." The disappointed Bizet described it as "an honorable, brilliant failure," referring to it in a letter to his publisher Choudens as "Les Pêcheurs de Crevettes"—"The Shrimp Fishers."

Hector Berlioz, himself a misunderstood pioneer, disagreed. In his review in Journal des Débats, he asserted, "The score of Les Pêcheurs de Perles does M. Bizet the greatest honor," describing it as "filled with fire and rich coloring" and "ravishing originality."

Modern critical opinion has gradually warmed to The Pearl Fishers, recognizing in it the melodic gifts, imaginative orchestration, and sure dramatic instincts that would fully bloom a decade later in Carmen. But the opera's libretto has continued to endure scorn for its unlikely coincidences, stereotyped characterizations, and prosaic verse. Cormon, one of the librettists, himself later admitted, "Had we known of the talent of M. Bizet, we would never have given him our white elephant." Nevertheless, their libretto can be deemed a good one in 19th-century terms: an effective scaffold for vivid, compact, fast-paced musical drama. And the music that Bizet draped on that scaffold is among the finest of French opéra lyrique, the elegant Romantic style refined to a high sheen by Gounod. The score's highlights are justifiably popular: Nadir and Zurga's stirring Act I friendship duet, "Au fond du temple saint," whose sweeping theme becomes the opera's main motif; Leïla's Act II cavatina, "Comme autrefois," whose expansive melody, triple meter, and pair of French horns foreshadow Micaëla's aria in Carmen; and Nadir's Act I barcarole, "Je crois entendre encore," whose Phrygian scale and haunting English horn solo against muted strings create a strongly exotic flavor.

After its opening run, The Pearl Fishers was not performed again until 11 years after Bizet's death and the runaway success of Carmen. In 1886, it was presented at La Scala in Italian, followed by regular stagings in European cities, also often in Italian. It did not reach Paris again until 1889. In 1893 it received its U.S. premiere in Philadelphia and in 1896, its first two acts were performed at the Met on a double bill with Massenet's one-act opera La Navarraise. In the mid-20th century, it began to enter the opera repertory worldwide.

Unfortunately, all of these performances were based on badly corrupted editions of Bizet's score. After his death in 1875, his widow was careless with his musical legacy, letting a number of his autograph scores go astray, including that of The Pearl Fishers. Choudens published a second piano vocal score in 1887–88 and a "nouvelle edition" in 1893, which incorporated the corruptions that had crept into recent revivals; these scores remained the basis of productions for nearly a century.

The opera's finale, a bone of contention even before its premiere, was the most compromised portion of the corrupt editions, disfigured to provide what was thought to be a more dramatic ending—"a grand Meyerbeerian holocaust," as Bizet biographer Winton Dean put it. In one version, a villager stabs Zurga in the back as we hear the offstage voices of Leïla and Nadir. In other versions Zurga is burned at the stake. This finale also included a trio composed by Benjamin Godard.

In the 1970s, an authentic 1863 vocal score was discovered, spurring efforts to reconstruct the score in accordance with Bizet's intentions, and Arthur Hammond orchestrated the restored portions that existed only in the vocal score. In the 1990s, Bizet's original 1863 six-stave short score was discovered in the Bibliothèque Nationale de France. It became the basis for the critical edition, prepared by Brad Cohen and published by Edition Peters in 2002, that is performed this season at the Met.
