Synopsis

Act I

A manor house near Seville, the 1930s. In a storeroom that they have been allocated, Figaro and Susanna, servants to the Count and Countess Almaviva, are preparing for their wedding. Figaro is furious when he learns from his bride that the Count has tried to seduce her. He's determined to have revenge on his master. Dr. Bartolo appears with his former housekeeper, Marcellina, who is equally determined to marry Figaro. She has a contract: Figaro must marry her or repay the money that he borrowed from her. When Marcellina runs into Susanna, the two rivals exchange insults. Susanna returns to her room, and the Count's young page Cherubino rushes in. Finding Susanna alone, he speaks of his love for all the women in the house, particularly the Countess. When the Count appears, again trying to seduce Susanna, Cherubino hides, but when Don Basilio, the music teacher, approaches, the Count conceals himself. Basilio tells Susanna that everyone knows Cherubino has a crush on the Countess. Outraged, the Count steps forward, but he becomes even more enraged when he discovers Cherubino and realizes that the boy has overheard his attempts to seduce Susanna. He chases Cherubino into the great hall, encountering Figaro, who has assembled the entire household to sing the praises of their master. Put on the spot, the Count is forced to bless the marriage of Figaro and Susanna. To spite them and to silence Cherubino, he orders the boy to join the army without delay. Figaro sarcastically sends Cherubino off into battle.

Act II

In her bedroom, the Countess mourns the loss of love in her life. Encouraged by Figaro and Susanna, she agrees to set a trap for her husband: They will send Cherubino, disguised as Susanna, to a rendezvous with the Count that night. At the same time, Figaro will send the Count an anonymous note suggesting that the Countess is having an assignation with another man. Cherubino arrives, and the two women lock the door before dressing him in women's clothes. As Susanna steps into an adjoining room, the Count knocks and is annoyed to find the door locked. Cherubino hides himself in the dressing room, and the Countess lets her husband in. When there's a sudden noise from behind the door, the Count is skeptical of his wife's story that Susanna is in there. Taking his wife with him, he leaves to get tools to force the door. Meanwhile, Susanna, who has reentered the room unseen and observed everything, helps Cherubino escape through the window before taking his place in the dressing room. When the Count and Countess return, both are astonished when Susanna emerges from the room. Figaro arrives to begin the wedding festivities, but the Count questions him about the note he received. Figaro successfully eludes questioning until the gardener, Antonio, bursts in, complaining that someone has jumped from the window. Figaro improvises quickly, feigning a limp and pretending that it was he who jumped. As soon as Antonio leaves, Bartolo, Marcellina, and Basilio appear, putting their case to the Count and holding the contract that obliges Figaro to marry Marcellina. Delighted, the Count declares that Figaro must honor his agreement and that his wedding to Susanna will be postponed.

Intermission (AT APPROXIMATELY 9:10PM)

Act III

Later that day in the great hall, Susanna leads on the Count with promises of a rendezvous that night. He is overjoyed but then overhears Susanna conspiring with Figaro. In a rage, he declares that he will have revenge. The Countess, alone, recalls her past happiness. Marcellina, accompanied by a lawyer, Don Curzio, demands that Figaro pay his debt or marry her at once. Figaro replies that he can't marry without the consent of his parents for whom he's been searching for years, having been abducted as a baby. When he reveals a birthmark on his arm, Marcellina realizes that he is her long-lost son, fathered by Bartolo. Arriving to see Figaro and Marcellina embracing, Susanna thinks her fiancé has betrayed her, but she is pacified when she learns the truth. The Countess is determined to go through with the conspiracy against her husband, and she and Susanna compose a letter to him confirming the meeting with Susanna that evening in the garden. Cherubino, now disguised as a girl, appears with his sweetheart, Barbarina, the daughter of Antonio. Antonio, who has found Cherubino's cap, also arrives and reveals the young man. The Count is furious to discover that Cherubino has disobeyed him and is still in the house. Barbarina punctures his anger, explaining that the Count, when he attempted to seduce her, promised her anything she desired. Now, she wants to marry Cherubino, and the Count reluctantly agrees. The household assembles for Figaro and Susanna's wedding. While dancing with the Count, Susanna hands him the note, sealed with a pin, confirming their tryst that evening.

Act IV

At night in the garden, Barbarina despairs that she has lost the pin that the Count has asked her to take back to Susanna as a sign that he's received her letter. When Figaro and Marcellina appear, Barbarina tells them about the planned rendezvous between the Count and Susanna. Thinking that his bride is unfaithful, Figaro curses all women. He hides when Susanna and the Countess arrive, dressed in each other's clothes. Alone, Susanna sings of love. She knows that Figaro is listening and enjoys making him think that she's about to betray him with the Count. She then conceals herself—in time to see Cherubino try to seduce the disguised Countess. When the Count arrives looking for Susanna, he chases the boy away. Figaro, by now realizing what is going on, joins in the joke and declares his passion for Susanna in her Countess disguise. The Count returns to discover Figaro with his wife, or so he thinks, and explodes with rage. At that moment, the real Countess steps forward and reveals her identity. Ashamed, the Count asks her pardon. Ultimately, she forgives him, and the entire household celebrates the day's happy ending.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Le Nozze di Figaro

Premiere: Burgtheater, Vienna, 1786

A profoundly human comedy, Le Nozze di Figaro is a remarkable marriage of Mozart's music at the height of his genius and what might be the best libretto ever set. In adapting a play that caused a scandal with its revolutionary take on 18th-century society, librettist Lorenzo Da Ponte focused less on the original topical references and more on the timeless issues embedded in the frothy drawing-room comedy. The music is elegant, with a constant tension among the social classes and between the sexes, where each character has something to gain and something to hide. Following its successful Viennese premiere, Figaro became a major hit when it was produced in Prague a few months later—a triumph for Mozart that led to the commission to write Don Giovanni.

The Creators

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756–1791) was the son of a Salzburg court musician and composer, Leopold, who was also his principal teacher and exhibited him as a musical prodigy throughout Europe. His works continue to enthral audiences around the world, and his achievements in opera—in terms of beauty, vocal challenge, and dramatic insight—remain unsurpassed. The extraordinary Lorenzo Da Ponte (1749–1838) led an adventurous life in Venice and Vienna. He converted from Judaism as a youth and joined the Catholic Church, in which he took Holy Orders. He supplied libretti for several prominent composers of his time, including Antonio Salieri, and collaborated with Mozart on Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni, and Così fan tutte. Da Ponte migrated to America and eventually settled in New York, where he served as the first Professor of Italian at Columbia College (now University), and where he was instrumental in developing an audience for Italian opera. Pierre-Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais (1732–1799) was the author of the three subversive Figaro plays, of which Le Mariage de Figaro (1778) was the second. Beaumarchais's life included roles in both the American and French Revolutions, and his character Figaro, the wily servant who consistently outsmarts his masters, bears autobiographical markings. The sound of the name itself seems to point to the author: fils (“son of”) Caron.

The Setting

Seville, the setting of Figaro, was famous in Mozart's time as a place filled with hot-blooded young men and exotically beautiful women sequestered behind latticed windows, or “jealousies” (which gave us our English word “jealousy”). The Met’s current production of the opera places the action in an elegant Spanish villa in the 1930s.

The Music

Figaro’s amazing score mirrors the complex world it depicts. The first impression is one of tremendous elegance, but beneath the surface lies a subtext of pain and deception. The showpiece arias for the various women (“Porgi, Amor” for the Countess and Cherubino’s “Voi che sapete” in Act II; the Countess’s haunting “Dove sono i bei momenti” in Act III; and Susanna’s “Deh vieni non tardar” in Act IV) reflect the depth of the drama. Each of these arias is superb, delicate, and ravishingly beautiful. Other unforgettable solos in the score include Figaro’s two notable arias, the angry Act IV diatribe against womankind, “Aprite un po’ quegl’occhi,” and Act I’s “Non più andrai,” in which not even the most buoyant and memorable melody in the world can quite hide the character’s sarcasm. The orchestra, which often expresses the unspoken thoughts and motivations of the characters, conveys much of the work’s subtext. A good example of this is the wedding march in Act III—formal, stately, and elegant, yet with little quivering trills in the middle of the phrases that suggest something is amiss at this wedding.

Met History

Le Nozze di Figaro premiered at the Met in 1894 with a magnificent cast headed by the American sopranos Emma Eames and Lillian Nordica and with Edouard de Reszke as the Count. The company unveiled a new production in 1909, conducted by Gustav Mahler, in which Geraldine Farrar sang the trouser role of Cherubino. Another new production opened in 1940 with Ettore Panizza conducting Ezio Pinza, Elisabeth Rethberg, Bidú Sayão, and Risë Stevens. The ensemble nature of the piece and the appeal of each of the leading roles have made the subsequent rosters of Figaro at the Met an impressive collection of the world’s finest singers, including Eleanor Steber, Lisa Della Casa, Carol Vaness, and Renée Fleming (Countess); Roberta Peters, Kathleen Battle, and Cecilia Bartoli (Susanna); Jarmila Novotna, Frederica von Stade, and Susan Graham (Cherubino); Cesare Siepi and Sir Bryn Terfel (Figaro); and John Brownlee, Sir Thomas Allen, and Thomas Hampson (Count). Met Music Director Emeritus James Levine has conducted a record 77 performances with the company since 1985, including the premiere of Sir Richard Eyre’s production for the opening of the Met’s 2014–15 season, with a cast that included Amanda Majeski, Marlis Petersen, Isabel Leonard, Peter Mattei, and Ildar Abdrazakov.

Program Note

In Act III of Le Nozze di Figaro, in the midst of the usual comic-opera bustle of activity, the servant girl Susanna and the Countess Almaviva devise a plan to embarrass the Count (a notorious philanderer) by catching him dallying in the garden. The two of them will exchange clothes and, in the dark, the Countess, dressed as Susanna, will rendezvous with her own husband. The Countess decides to dictate a love letter to arrange the assignation, with Susanna dutifully writing it out. The ensuing duet (“Sull’aria”) is in two parts. In the first, the voices are separate (Susanna merely echoes the Countess’s words); in the second, their voices come together in blissful parallel intervals. The servant and the aristocrat, by being given the same melodic material, are levelled socially by means of music. This musical confusion of class structures can remind us that comic opera of Mozart’s time never lost a connection with its origins in commedia dell’arte improvisation—conditions in which social disorder is licensed and the established order can briefly be overturned. True, Mozart’s aristocratic characters tend generally to indulge in virtuosic singing derived from opera seria, while the servants tend generally to have simple, more memorable tunes. But sometimes, as occurs in Figaro, the servants can ape their masters, and the aristocrats can find themselves deflected into disarmingly simple means of expression. In other words, characters can freely take on and shed vocal idioms; they can seem, to put the matter in a contemporary way, to represent themselves as they choose.

A good example of the boundary-crossing this can involve is the servant Figaro’s aria in Act I, “Se vuol ballare,” in which he expresses anger that the Count’s wandering eye may now be directed toward his fiancée, Susanna. In terms of 18th-century class hierarchies, it’s shocking in that Figaro is here overtly voicing threats directed against the Count. But there’s also the fact, perhaps more shocking still, that the threats become musically palpable: This lowly servant sings out his feelings to the strains of a minuet, a stately aristocratic dance of the period—a dance, therefore, that he has no business inhabiting. More subtle still in its play of musical registers is the duet between the Count and Susanna at the start of Act III. The Count begins in high aristocratic tone, in a grandiose and mock pathetic minor mode (“Crudel! perché finora”). But then, in open musical contradiction, Susanna’s bland (and feigned) acceptance involves a distinct lowering of the tone: It has an artful turn to major-key simplicity that the Counts seems unable to reciprocate; he is reduced to simply repeating his pathetic, pleading manner. Finally, though, Susanna’s acceptance sinks in, and he launches into a grandiose celebration of victory (“Mi sento dal contento”). And again Susanna’s musical reaction rejects this attempted seduction. Although her words speak of acquiescence, she persistently refuses to take the melodic cues that the Count offers her, never once repeating his melody. Although at the end of the duet she is constrained by convention to accompany him briefly in parallel thirds, the overall musical impression is of yet another reversal: In a duet of contrasting musical levels, the aristocratic level has been artfully subverted.

However, among the many cross-class relationships that Figaro explores, it's the one between Susanna and the Countess—between a servant on the eve of her wedding and an aristocrat whose expectations from marriage have been cruelly dashed by experience—that is most poignant and subtle. The Act III letter-writing scene sets their essential musical kinship in place, but in Act IV, at the denouement of the opera, their parallel lives become central to the plot.

We should recall the dramatic situation, at that moment at its most complex. It is night, a time in opera often featuring mistaken identities—where characters exchange cloaks and hats, where the wrong lovers sometimes embrace in the dark. In opera of all periods, nocturnal scenes are an occasion for the composer to toy with novel orchestration and unusual timbres, to create a numinous alternative world. In the final scene of Verdi's Falstaff, for example, calls from unseen horns suggest spaces and events beyond the visible. Even though the fairies and elves that fill the stage are just ordinary folk in disguise, the sense that enchantment is at work in human events can't wholly be banished. Or there's the moment in Act III of Wagner's Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg when Hans Sachs looks back on the comic chaos of the previous night. He, too, thinks of fairies and magic: "A mischievous sprite was at work: A firefly couldn't find his mate; that caused all the trouble. Or it was the elder tree: Midsummer's Night!" Under the aegis of comic opera, Verdi and Wagner seem to have wandered together into a moonlit garden: The orchestral inspirations in these scenes are remarkably similar. And perhaps Mozart is with them as well. In Figaro's final act, playing out their letter-writing plot, Susanna appears disguised as the Countess. She is alone in the garden; Figaro is suspicious and lurks in the darkness. His suspicions seem confirmed when he hears her sing in eager anticipation of an amorous encounter (he cannot see her and so does not know she is in disguise). "Deh vieni non tardar," the aria she sings, is a character piece—a simple serenade in 6/8, which in outward shape suits the simple, un-elevated style of Susanna's music elsewhere in the opera.

But, tellingly, the aria also makes gestures towards a more elevated style, in particular in its text, where the invocation of the sultry night is highly poetic, even bordering on the old-fashioned, opera-seria school: "While the torch of night does not shine in the sky, while the air is still dark, and the world silent. Here murmurs the brook, here sports the breeze." What's more, Mozart clearly responded to this shift in tone by supplying a serious-sounding opening orchestral introduction and featuring prominent wind parts (both musical features more likely to accompany "high-born" characters). In other words, Susanna's musical and poetic styles here bear traces of her costume—of the fact that she is disguised as the Countess. In what is already a very complicated opera in terms of plot, this risks getting very complicated indeed. Overheard but unseen by Figaro, Susanna sings the aria as part of a performance, to trick Figaro into thinking that she is eager for a liaison with the Count. Although dressed as another, she might be thought to be singing in “her own” voice, but it’s not really “her own,” as the sentiments she utters are feigned (a liaison with the Count is, after all, what she has spent the entire opera avoiding) and the musical style bears traces of the Countess, whose clothes she is wearing. What are we to make of this?

The Act III letter scene’s establishment of a kinship, an emotional equality even, between Susanna and the Countess, is developed further when they exchange clothes in the last act, cementing it as one of the central issues of the drama. In this context, it’s fascinating to learn that, probably for practical reasons that emerged during rehearsal, Mozart changed his mind about the vocal disposition of his two sopranos, particularly about who should take the upper part in ensembles. In other words, and partly for the kinds of practical reasons that always impinge on opera, these two characters continually weave in and out of each other’s vocal personalities. At an early stage in the composition of Figaro, Mozart even sketched an elite-sounding two-movement aria for the first Susanna, the British soprano Nancy Storace (1765–1817)—and to judge by a highly strenuous two-tempo concert piece that he wrote for her the year after, she would have been fully up to the task. What’s more, the history books tell us that Storace was well-known for her ability to imitate others. Famously, during the final scene, Susanna indeed disguises her voice, trying to fool Figaro into thinking she is the Countess. So what identity does Susanna advance in her nocturnal aria? Perhaps the fact that we cannot fully answer this question is part of why so many listeners find Le Nozze di Figaro so uniquely compelling.

WHEELCHAIR ACCOMMODATIONS

Telephone 212-799-3100, ext. 2204. Wheelchair entrance at Concourse level.

The exits indicated by a red light and the sign nearest the seat you occupy are the shortest routes to the street. In the event of fire or other emergency, please do not run—walk to that exit.

In compliance with New York City Department of Health regulations, smoking is prohibited in all areas of this theater.

Patrons are reminded that in deference to the performing artists and the seated audience, those who leave the auditorium during the performance will not be readmitted while the performance is in progress.

The photographing or sound recording of any performance, or the possession of any device for such photographing or sound recording inside this theater, without the written permission of the management, is prohibited by law. Offenders may be ejected and liable for damages and other lawful remedies.

Use of cellular telephones and electronic devices for any purpose, including email and texting, is prohibited in the auditorium at all times. Please be sure to turn off all devices before entering the auditorium.
